Order of Merit explained

The BSI Order of Merit is one of the most prestigious titles for any student who joins our Academy to receive.

The Order of Merit winner is the individual who has attained the most points during our school year through our weekly 18, 36 and 72-hole medal events. Points are allocated on final positions at each BSI tournament. Extra points can be attained for under par scores and personal bests. The table below shows the points allocation and breakdown we use for our various medal competitions.

The overall winners in both the Premier Academy and Junior Academy receive great prizes from our sponsors, Srixon, Puma, and ProltUp.

Is it possible to not think of scores?

Performance Tip of the week

Brought by Mark Fairbank, BSI Mental Coach and Head of Golf Performance

One of the many tips you will hear in the clubhouse about golf is that you must not think about your score. This is common advice that comes across as sound and logical. However, how is it possible to not think of your score? If a player is playing par 5 and has taken 4 shots to get in the hole, how is it possible to not know that they took 4 shots, or that they've just made birdie, or that they're now 1 under par?

The concept of not thinking about your score becomes even more bizarre as you play competitive golf. You will fill out your scorecard after each hole, your partner will confirm your score as you walk off the green, and there could be live scoring taking place – in which case you input your scores into a device or call them out to an official every few holes. If you are playing professional golf, there will be someone walking behind you with a big board showing your score, and beside every tee box and behind every green there will be a leaderboard. And yet, players are advised not to think about their scores.

So what is the solution? Instead of wasting your mental energy trying to hide from what is in front of you, be more conscious of the fact you cannot control or determine what your end score will be until you have sunk your last putt.

You cannot control your score for a particular round, nor for each hole. Golf is a game filled with a number of uncontrollable factors that influence the outcomes of a shot and ultimately our end scores. To perform well, we must accept this and build a relationship with score where we let go of controlling them and embrace that anything can happen at any time. It is a powerful position to be in mentally, to stand on the first tee and embrace that you don't know what your score will be. Focusing on your own processes, decision-making, routines, and emotional control throughout the day will each assist in getting you closer to the end score you want. The course doesn't care how badly you want a certain score. You can only manage yourself and each decision you make to give the best possible chance of having a desired outcome.
